start a podcast

Decide whether a podcast earns a place in your marketing.

♥ A note from Priscilla

Before you buy the microphone.

If you're here, you've probably been thinking about starting a podcast for a while. Maybe you've watched other people launch theirs. Maybe you've drafted a name in your notes app. Maybe you've been circling the decision, unsure if now is the right time.

The truth is, a podcast becomes a great business asset when it's connected to something real: your work, your point of view, the people you actually want to reach. When it's not, it becomes another thing on the list. This workbook helps you figure out which one yours would be - before you invest the time!

How to use this workbook.

Work through each section in order. Be honest. Write messy first drafts. There are no right answers... only clear ones and unclear ones. By the end, you'll know whether a podcast belongs in your business right now, and what it would actually be about.

⁎Why I built this

I run a done-for-you podcast launch service called The Signal. I put this workbook together because I kept talking with business owners who were excited about the idea of a podcast but hadn't had the space to think if all the way through. This is that space!

Fit

Where are you right now?

Before we talk about what your show could be, it's worth pausing to notice what's already in place. Some of these will feel true. Some might still be forming. Both are useful to know!

Check whatever feels true for you today.

- [ ] I have an offer or service I'm proud of.
- [ ] My ideal client benefits from getting to know me before they buy.
- [ ] I have things to say my audience can't get from a Google search.
- [ ] My business grows through trust and relationships, not just reach.
- [ ] I'm ready to commit to publishing consistently for a while.
- [ ] I'd rather build one strong asset than chase three new platforms.

Look back at what you checked. What's already true? What's still forming? There's no wrong answer here. This is just orientation. The next section is where the real work starts.

What is your show actually about?

This is the section that separates a podcast from a show. Most people can name their topic. Fewer can name their angle - the specific lens through which they see it. That angle is what makes a podcast yours, and it's what makes it worth showing up for, week after week. These prompts will help you find your angle.

The one-sentence show.

If someone asked "what's your podcast about?" at a dinner party, what would you say in one sentence? Don't overthink it. Write the first version that comes to mind.

The business connection.

How does this show connect to what you sell? Not in a salesy way... in a "this is the worldview my work lives inside" way. What belief or perspective does your show share with your offer?

Section 02 · continued

Two more prompts.

The conversation test.

List ten episode topics you could record tomorrow without doing any new research. Just conversations you already have in your head.

01. _____ 02. _____

03. _____ 04. _____

05. _____ 06. _____

07. _____ 08. _____

09. _____ 10. _____

If ten came easily, your angle is probably in good shape. If you got stuck around six or seven, that's useful information too — it might mean the angle needs sharpening, or that you'd want a co-host or interview format to help carry it.

The differentiation check.

Think about the shows already serving your audience. What would yours do differently... a different angle, a different depth, a different format, a different point of view? What would make someone choose to press play on yours?

How would this compound for you?

A podcast isn't a marketing tactic, it's a compounding asset. Each episode builds on the last. Walk through the five stages below and map what each one would look like for your business.

One conversation

A single episode with one guest or one idea, recorded in under an hour. How often could you realistically record? Weekly, biweekly, monthly?

Months of content

Clips, quotes, newsletters, social posts, all from that one conversation. List everything you could pull from a single episode. Where would each piece live?

Recognized expertise

Over time, you become the person who talks about this. People start associating you with the topic before they've even met you. What do you want to be known for?

Trust

Listeners feel like they already know you. The sales conversation gets shorter.

Where do prospects usually hesitate with you now, and how would thirty minutes of you in their ears every week change that?

Clients

By the time someone books a call, they've already decided. The podcast did the selling for you.

What's one client worth to you? If a podcast brought in even two more per year, what would that mean?

Math

A weekly podcast takes three to five hours per week once you include prep, recording, editing, and promotion. The return isn't immediate. It compounds over six to twelve months of consistent publishing. Look back at what you wrote above. If the math worked, what would this be worth to you in twelve months? In twenty-four?

♥ You made it

You've done the work most people skip.

Look back through what you wrote. You now know things about your business, your voice, and your audience that most people never sit still long enough to figure out. That's real work, whether or not you ever hit record.

What has to exist before episode one

- ☐ Positioning and a name nobody's already using.
- ☐ Cover art at the exact spec.
- ☐ Audio and visual identity.
- ☐ A host, an RSS feed, and seven directory submissions, two of which take weeks to approve.
- ☐ A show description written so it actually gets found.
- ☐ A recording and editing workflow.
- ☐ Templates for the show notes, the email, and the clips.
- ☐ A publishing rhythm you can hold for a year or more.
- ☐ And more...

The thinking was never the hard part, building the system is.

♥ So...

Let me build it.

The Signal The Signal is my done-for-you podcast launch service for established business owners. Your positioning and show name, cover art, audio branding, hosting and RSS setup, submission to every major directory, your recording and editing workflow, and templates for the show notes, episode email, and clips. etc. Built around your business, then handed over. You own all of it from day one.

What you leave with.

A published show, and a week that takes hours instead of days. Templates for everything you'll repeat. And full ownership of all of it. No logins held back, nothing that breaks if we stop working together.
